ViQo-DECLARATION

In a world of dramatic change with rapid technological advancement, including an influence of communications media greater than ever before, we believe that the fundamental questions of mankind need to be addressed again. The peace of mankind depends on guiding the processes of change so that they will be changes for the better rather than for the worse. But if we are to know what changes are “for the better”, we must understand what the good is. And this raises fundamental questions: What is the good for man? What is justice? What is peace? What is freedom? It is not possible to remain neutral towards these questions. Every attempt at promoting the welfare of our world implies answers to them.

We firmly believe that a true understanding of religion is indispensable in the search for truth, goodness, and justice without which there will be no peace. We hold that all things have been created by the all-powerful and all-wise God, and that the objective truth in the world which we call “nature” is therefore related to the reason of God. Humankind can find in nature a so-called “natural law” that helps them to see what is truly good. We call on scholars in all fields to help develop understanding of this ethical code of natural law.

A peaceful coexistence of nations cannot prevail unless religious and political leaders stand together in their effort to contribute to the search for truth and the fostering of the virtues – the necessary and constant education of mankind. This implies the understanding that human beings have obligations, duties, and rights that flow from the nature that God has given them. They are obliged to work together for the common good, to defend innocent life, and human dignity. They must allow one another the right to such goods as self-preservation, procreation, the increase of knowledge, participation in social life, and especially the worship God.

We believe that true peace cannot be established unless politics can be reconnected to morality and faith in God. The wellbeing of society and the state depend to a large extent on the active role of religion within them. We therefore call on political leaders to respect the contribution of religion to the common good. And we call on the religious communities to develop mutual understanding, deeper insight into the fundamental ethical and social questions facing mankind and to develop common standpoints where possible.
